AEROLAB Curriculum

How things fly is always a topic of high student interest. AeroLab lessons feature simple foam and balsa model airplanes as tools to teach middle and high school math and physical science. The lessons focus on Newton's laws of Force and Motion; students learn to calculate the average speed of a moving object and illustrate the motion of objects on graphs of distance over time. They learn to describe qualitative relationships among force, mass and changes in motion as well as forces acting on an object moving in a circular path. All labs are geared to state and national middle-level math and physical science standards. The lessons are designed for directed or guided inquiry, using simple flying machines to illustrate basic activities linking math to physical science, providing opportunities for students to collect data and graph results, as well as participate in teams to analyze data and manipulate variables. Participants in this workshop will build and fly model aircraft, and each will receive classroom materials with lessons teachers can use on Monday!
